The majority of fighting on the Western Front was described as "Trench Warfare." Long, narrow ditches were dug into the ground. Soldiers fought, slept, ate, and lived in the trenches.

Tanks made their first appearance in World War I. The British were the first to put them into use. They were called "landships" originally.

Airships, like the German Zeppelin, were used for bombing raids. These aircraft are large air filled frames propelled by several engines.

Early in World War I, planes were not equipped with weapons and were only used for spying missions. As the war continued, machine guns were added to planes, creating the first fighter airplanes.

The U-boat, short for undersea boat, was the German submarine used during World War I.
